we attempt to organise a home? Where shall we look for a pattern of a home? In the consideration of these questions, I would that I were able to bring to bear some words which would stimulate a desire for a lottier love of home. It is said, and said truly, "that upon the sacredness of our homes depends the life of this Nation," for the home is so intimately connected and so finely interwoven with government, that the care of one necessarily involves that of the other.

The first thought of a home is to provide a place in which to live, eat, sleep, rest and work; in other words a dwelling where a certain number of human belags live together. But is there no truer and higher meaning to the word than this? If we will look carefully around us we shall find the beautiful dwelling, the manion with all its glittering and costly furnishing; draped with all that wealth and art can put together, and still be the abode of want and misery; while the No. 21.

Massachusetts Agriculture.

From Wm. R. Sessions, Secretary of the Manachusetts Board of Agriculture, we have received the Thirty-Seventh Annual Report of the State Experiment Station, the whole forming a volume of over six hundred pages, printed in clast type, and well bound. The contents are made up of a review, by the Secretary, the lectures, papers, and discussions in full, five at the annual winter public meeting of the Board, and the full report of the Experiment Station. The public characes apread upon its pages are of a high order, and may safely be taken by the writing farmers into whose hands it falls, at a safe guide in leading the way to better faming and a more complete success.
